CRAZY HORSE

- From childhood on, Crazy Horse was both handsome and modest. His parents gave great feasts to celebrate their son's achievements such as his first step or his first word. During the winter, when he was about four or five, his tribe was snowed in and very short on food. The men could not find the buffalo herds. One day, the boy's father brought home two antelope. Without asking permission, Crazy Horse jumped on his pony, rode through camp, and told the elders that they could pick up some meat at his parents' tipi. His mother had to give almost all the meat away. The next day, when Crazy Horse asked for food, his mother explained that it was all gone, saying, "Remember, my son, they went home singing praises¹ in your name, not my name or your father's. You must be brave. You must live up to² your reputation."
- Crazy Horse would live up to his reputation, showing that he was really brave. When he was just sixteen he joined a war party and followed a well-known Sioux warrior, Hump, into battle against the Gros Ventres. When Hump's horse was wounded Crazy Horse was there to pick him up and carry him to safety. The two became lifelong friends. Crazy Horse was again at his side when Hump died in a fight with a neighbouring tribe.
- He never forgot his parents' lessons of generosity either. In his early twenties, during a winter buffalo hunt, Crazy Horse took ten buffalo in just one day. He knew that his father was a skilled hunter who would not return home empty-handed, so he left all ten buffalo for the less fortunate men - those who had no meat to take home to their families. We can imagine praises once again sung in the name of Crazy Horse. And in battle, Crazy Horse often chose not to kill his enemy, because he saw no reason to throw away a life in that way.
